1. A Line of Fire Stone-faced, Farraday and his client sat at the head table in the Palm Beach Club. The law firm's partners had requested that Ranae grace them with her presence, they explained, and were happy to stand aside in her defense. "We're confident she's going to win the case," said her father, who sat in the first row, next to Farraday, and didn't bother to introduce himself. "She's strong, smart, and has an excellent lawyer." "When she was first arrested, it took the police days to locate the lawyer that the district attorney said could represent her." Farraday hadn't stopped working his brow since Ranae had walked into the club. "That's because they were working from the back of the phone book," he said, in answer to a question he knew wasn't being asked. Ranae looked at her father from beneath her eyelashes. "He's not bad," she said, "but maybe not as good as you." "What's that supposed to mean?" "It means he has to make sure he gets everything he needs in order to win the case. You don't, so you have to work a little harder to get what you want." Farraday looked at her. "You can't think like that," he said. "Once you decide what you're going to fight for, you have to win at everything. You can't lose the case and be unhappy about it. You have to be okay with losing, so you can be happy about winning." Ranae smiled. She touched her ear and leaned forward, to whisper, "Don't forget that I have a private investigator doing the job for me, too, Daddy, and he's not a girl." "Ranae!" Farraday rose from the table, pushing back his chair. "Don't you think you're better off than that?" "That's what you said before, when you decided to 82157476af
