The National Health and Medical Research Council defines health as being "a state of complete physical, mental and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease or infirmity" (p. 8). While this definition has much to commend it, it seems to overlook the importance of psychological well-being as an equally essential part of the health equation. The authors argue that it is possible to integrate these definitions by first defining health as a state of mental and physical well-being. This leads to a more comprehensive definition of health than the one developed by the National Health and Medical Research Council, but it is not possible to include the concept of social well-being as it is covered only indirectly by the measures employed in the majority of health research. A concept of health is also introduced which includes the concept of flow. While not unimportant as a concept in its own right, flow only becomes relevant to health when linked to the psychological well-being of the individual. It is argued that the physical health measures (i.e., HRQOL) employed by many researchers are of little value in themselves and that the impact that illness has on the physical and social lives of the affected person are much more important. In particular, it is argued that much of the well-known lack of interest in research studies with the elderly is based on the under-valuation of their physical health by the social measures and that this has been exacerbated by the current practice of employing physical health measures.
